Exclusions.

Natural variations in wood color and grain are natural to "living finishes" and are not considered "defects" under the terms of this warranty. Teak wood will also naturally patina, and change color over time and with normal use. Checking, or slight cracking of teak wood is also a normal and natural occurrence of the wood that will not affect its integrity, and should be expected.

Shipping damage, damage incurred as a result of improper installation, unauthorized modification or repair, and damage due to improper cleaning, misuse or neglect are not covered. Normal wear and tear, or deterioration resulting from the normal, regular use of the cabinetry is also not warranted.

ABOUT TEAK

Why Teak

Teak is the only serious choice for wood outdoor cabinetry. No other wood in the world compares to teak in its elegance, durability, stability and low maintenance. In fact, teak requires less maintenance, and will last even longer than stainless steel. Teak's grain pattern and patina place it among the world's most beautiful hardwoods and considered by woodworkers to be of the finest quality. Teak is famous for its tensile strength and straight grain which resist warping and shrinkage, making it one of the few hardwoods strong and stable enough for solid wood doors and cabinet fabrication.

Teak has been the top choice for shipbuilders and outdoor furniture makers alike for centuries due to its ability to withstand any weather, and for its resistance to decay. Teak wood is naturally repellent to moisture and insects, and virtually immune to the effects of extreme weather including hot sun, rain, frost and snow. It will easily last 100 years unaffected if left unprotected outdoors. Teak beams many centuries old are commonly seen in good condition, including in palaces and temples over 1,000 years old. In fact, intact teak structures have been discovered buried in the jungles of Southeast Asia dating back 1,000 years. Teak is the only wood in the world that can make these claims.

Caring for Teak

One of the greatest features of quality teak wood is that it requires very little maintenance and ages gracefully. If you appreciate the natural color of aged teak, then all you really have to do to keep it looking good is give it an occasional cleaning. A good rinse once or twice a month with a garden hose and wipe down with a towel is plenty in most cases. If you prefer the golden color of new teak, more regular cleanings will maintain much of the original hue. You can also treat teak wood with a teak protector or sealer. This will not extend the life of the wood, but it will preserve the golden honey tone that many people love. Oiling teak will also preserve teak's golden color, but starts a maintenance regimen that involves cleaning and re-oiling every 3 months to 1 year.

Regular cleanings are important to remove contaminants from the wood which can grow mold or fungus and eventually damage the exterior of the wood. If you notice little dark spots on the wood's surface, clean them as soon as possible. In a harsher environment, or when cleaning has been neglected, a light scrub with a teak cleaner or mild dish soap and clean water with a soft, nylon bristle brush is all it takes. We do not recommend using a pressure washer to clean our teak cabinetry, but it can be done as long as you do so very carefully and are aware that too much pressure can damage the surface of the wood. Use only low pressure, a wide spray nozzle, and keep the tip at least 12" away from the teak.

A Note About Color Staining

Wood stains are intended to be permanent. Once you stain teak, you can't un-stain it. In other words, you cannot return to the natural golden brown or silver-grey color without numerous sandings. If you choose to stain teak after it has turned silver-grey, you must first sand it before applying stain.

A Note About Oiling

The natural oils that protect teak wood from weather, pests and rot is always inside the wood. Additional coats of oil added to the exterior won't soak in and penetrate the wood to protect it. In fact, commercial "teak oil" may actually deplete the oils that are there naturally. This is because "teak oil" includes solvents which can break down and damage the natural oils in teak wood. If you decide you want to oil your teak, 100% tung oil or linseed oil is a better choice. Oils may also hold moisture and contaminants that can develop mold and fungus.

If you've already applied teak oil to your teak, don't panic. Just give it a good cleaning to remove the oil, then apply teak protector, or tung or linseed oil if you wish. Another option is to lightly sand the very outer surface layer of the wood. This will expose a new layer of fresh wood that will have a golden tone.
